STORY OF SANTA CLAUS

"Very sorry, but Santa Claus he is too msy to see any one." "But." I insisted. "It is very important, and I'd only keep him a minute." 'No." said the rosy-cheeked old lady. "He simply won't see anybody. Why, we have to pass him his meals through a little door in the wall of his workro m. And he hasn't slept for nights and nights. ruly, I'm sorry to send you away, after you have come so far, but-can't you ome again, say about the twenty-sixth of December?

Very well," said I sadly, "Fil go. I'm not disappointed, but, after all, I didn't really expect to see him."

"I beg your pardon?" said the old lady.
"No." I replied, buttoning my coat and turning away, "I only came out to confirm the growing suspicion that there isn't any such person as Santa, Claus, Good merning." "Eh? What's that?"

From within the cottage a deep bars rumbled out these words, which were followed by a chattering of wood and metal, as though some one were suddenly rising from a workbeach and dropping his tools. I smiled, for I perceived that my ruse had succeeded.

"Who says there's no such person? demanded the bass voice. "Who says

"Well" said I "it's being rumored more and more every year, and-"Outrageous! Scandalous! What is the verld coming to? 1-1-ugh!"

The sturdy tramp, tramp of heavy oots across the hall within, and the man I had come so far to see stood before me in the open door, an incontrovertible proof. that not only did he exist, but was very,

His round, broad frame trembled, and his long, white beard seemed to bristle as he made his appearance, for he was unmistakably provoked for the moment. But in another second his mood changed. Anger gave way to amusement, and his shook the house "No such a person" he chucklei. "No such person as Santa Claus! Ha, ha, ha! Ho. ho. ho!"

His laughter was infectious, and soon Santa Claus and I found ourselves chuckling as merrily as the good saint, for itw as none other than he.

Yes, it was good old Santa Claus, now several hundred years old, but hule and hearty, who invited me into his little ottage and ushered me through a snowdrift of packages into his workshop.

I would describe him to you, only you have seen his pictures so much that you know exactly how he looks. But as for this magical workshop! I am afraid that if I ever began to tell you about it I could never fluish. There was so much in itdells, steam engines, horses, soidiers, balls, bats, games, sieds, skates-everything that begins with A and everything that begins with Z, and everything that begins with the letters between. I've seen a lot in my time, and I've been given the run of several toy shops, but when I looked about Santa Claus' workshop I just opened my mouth and said, O-o-oh!

Santa Claus seated himself at a bench on which were toys of atl kinds, most of them only partly finished. Immediately he began to work on one-a beautiful
